Social Technologies, MA

ASSTCMA

Program Description

Degree Awarded: MA Social Technologies

ASU's West campus offers an MA in social technologies for those interested in researching social media and other technologies that affect social and organizational change. The program engages the theory of social technologies through its application and it prepares graduates to be leaders in the field of social media; work with the social and human dimensions of emerging technologies; consult on broader uses of technology by for-profit, non-profit and governmental organizations; or, continue on to doctoral work.

The social technologies program provides a grounding in social, behavioral, cultural and design approaches to critically interrogating the social uses of data, the ethics and politics of social computing, and algorithmic culture more broadly.

The flexible curriculum consists of three required courses in the theory, research and application of social technologies as well as a range of in-person and online elective courses from across the university and it culminates in a six credit hour capstone project.
